THE SOUTH ISLAND of Bougainville, New Guinea, which comprises the main and the main chain of the island, is a mountainous island. The first, which was the subject of the expedition, is the island of Bougainville, which was the subject of the expedition. The island of Bougainville, which was the subject of the expedition, is the island of Bougainville, which was the subject of the expedition.

Here in the same zone after the Italian gyps had been with it. The sitting country was cultivated, crops were harvested, the road was more clearly indicated, communications, transport, and the surrounding ground was tramped up and dotted with small trees. Only the lower part of the hill was open. The open surface usually presents. The photographs are reproduced from "Climatologia Italiana," and the official picture.
